SUMMARY

This dissertation is an exploratory study of the ideas put forward by theorists of post-Development. This current of thought emerged as a radical critique of the Development discourse, proclaiming that no reformulation could change the essential character of it, that being the “Westernisation” of the world. As post-Development’s definitions rely on their opposition to what Development represents, from a theoretical point of view as well as in the myriad of behaviours resulting from it, the starting point of the thesis is an analytical account of Development discourse through the various theories that have shaped it during the second half of the 20th century. Other theories that can be considered outside mainstream Development are also analysed as well as those conventionally classified as alternative Development. A whole chapter is then dedicated to thoroughly review the historical unfolding of the Development discourse.

The following chapter deals with the ideas put forward by post-Development. It relies on a series of publications identified with this current of thought as well as with information provided by one of its most prominent authors, Dr. Wolfgang Sachs, in an interview conducted by the author of this thesis. It also uses an unpublished manuscript given to the author by Gustavo Esteva, also prominent in the constitution and dissemination of the ideas of post-Development.

In an effort to identify whether post-Development has remained at the level of theoretical formulation or if it has informed practices on the ground, research about the activities and underlying beliefs of the Global Barter Network (in Uruguay and in Argentina) and the World Social Forum was undertaken. The field-study, which is presented in the 4th chapter of the thesis, aimed at researching these particular initiatives and draw conclusions with respect to the existence of coincidences with the ideas of post-Development. The dissertation concludes then with an analysis of post-Development’s major contributions to the Development debate, of its relationship with already existing practices, of its distinctiveness from alternative Development. It analyses the originality of the post-Development discourse and makes proposals for further research.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Writing this thesis has been a challenging and pleasant experience. Throughout the way I found encouragement and support from many people, some directly linked to the process and some who unexpectedly inspired me and provided the necessary fuel for thinking and writing. I want to thank Professor Peter Stewart, my promoter at UNISA, who for the last four years listened to me, challenged my thoughts, suggested inspiring literature and helped me to shape and give direction to a heap of ideas that materialised in this dissertation. He gave me a strong sense of purpose and of relevancy of the tasks we had embarked upon.

I want especially to mention two of the post-Development writers, Wolfgang Sachs and Gustavo Esteva. When in 1992 I read “The Development Dictionary. A Guide to Knowledge as Power” edited by Sachs, I felt compelled to understand the world in new ways, to challenge my own knowledge and become attentive to the multiplicity of ways in which people were shaping their lives and those of their communities. I was very privileged when the following year Gustavo Esteva was invited to give a series of talks at the University of Bremen where I was studying. These talks and the conversation we had one afternoon in November 1993 were, without any doubt, the greatest motivation to embark seriously on this research. I want to thank Esteva and Sachs, whom I eventually interviewed in 2002. Both were open, frank, and hospitable.

I also want to thank Jairo Arrow, my husband. He has trusted and encouraged me. But he has been critical enough to let me know when harder work was needed, when my emotions were not the best companion for the task I had in my hands.

Collective thanks go to the members of the Uruguayan Barter Network who so willingly shared information with me but also hopes and enthusiasm, in particular to Martha Silva and Alvaro Antoniello.
Many other people contributed in one way or another to this thesis, Christian Johnston, the research assistant in Uruguay, Heloisa Primavera, from the Argentine Barter Network who has written extensively about the experience, Carmen Terra, current Director of the Department of Social Work at the University of the Republic in Montevideo, among others. Some of them, I do not know their names. They struggle, with joy, for a better world. And they inspire works, like this one, which hope to contribute to that magnificent task.
