3.2 ROMAN CATHOLIC

The first Christian missionary to Southern Africa was the Jesuit, Gonzala da SIlveira. He landed on the coast of Mozambique in 1560, but his mission ended in martyrdom on 16 March 1561. It was not until the 19th century that systematic mission work was started in South Africa. The order of Oblates of Mary Immaculate worked in Basutoland (Lesotho) where the well-known mission station, Roma, was established in 1862. Mariannhill Monastery in Natal was founded by the Trappists in 1882.

Lourdes, S.A. was a Trappist mission station in East Griqualand.

As early as 1655, ten years before the arrival of the first fully ordained clergyman to be appointed at the Cape, the Ziekentrooster (Catechist) Wylant was attempting to instruct local Hottentots in the elements of the Christian religion. Van Lier and Vos towards the end of the eighteenth century began to stimulate and awaken the consciences of the colonists in regard to the plight of the slaves and heathen about them. At its first Synod in 1824 the mission work of this church was placed on a formal footing; but an imaginative, energetic thrust to carry the Gospel to the heathen came out of the Synod of 1857, which date marks the real beginning of Dutch Reformed missions in the sub-continent.
