ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Thank you to Dr Hannie Schoeman, who initiated my passion for Gestalt therapy and to Dr Magdie van Heerden, my supervisor, who knew how to respect my boundaries.

To the staff and learners of Wordsworth High School: Without your support, sometimes grudgingly, this research would have been impossible. Gert Jordaan and Marinda Ponelis, my two Deputy Principals, thank you for your support throughout the research programme and the writing of this dissertation. To Jill Wilson, Head of the English Department, you are a language editor supreme.

Marileen and Anria thank you for being proud of your mother.

A special thank you to Bradley and Heleen. You had to sacrifice the most. Without your patience, love and assistance this degree would have stayed a dream.

Movement in Gestalt therapeutic intervention, using structured activities and free improvisations, is a successful alternative to punishing adolescents with disruptive behavioural tendencies in the classroom. An overview of the existing literature regarding the therapeutic value of movement in Gestalt therapeutic intervention for adolescents with disruptive behavioural tendencies is firstly presented. Various techniques supporting the adolescent in his quest to achieve equilibrium, ultimately improving his relationships with others and his environment, are described. A case study, involving eight adolescents with disruptive behavioural tendencies in group therapy follows, which indicates that movement in Gestalt therapy is an alternative to punishment. In the light hereof it is suggested that movement in Gestalt therapy could be implemented successfully in the formal school environment. This form of intervention can contribute to the adolescent’s growth, his ability to communicate and his relationships with self, others and the environment, culminating in improved behavioural tendencies.
