August 1961.

Dear Sir/Madam,

The above headed publication is a valuable and timely discussion of the role of the university in a tropical territory, and it includes a comprehensive review of the philosophy of university education in different parts of the world.

As you well know, a new university is necessarily modelled by its staff on the system with which they have been acquainted elsewhere. By focusing on the University College, Ibadan, in Nigeria, the authors show how a university can develop and adapt itself to the needs and conditions of a fast-developing country.

This publication is of particular and special interest to all university students and adult readers in this country particularly those interested in the problem of new university colleges. The contents of this book include a comprehensive preface and historical introduction. It deals with the nature and function of a university, the method of university education, the university and the community, and many others.

This is without doubt a most important book and one which should be read by educationists, members of university faculties, university students and all adult readers.

8s.6d. English published price
Rl.15 South African Price

Yours faithfully,

Philip Wymore

PHILIP WYMORE